Rule for Defending Against Novel Claims in Patent Cases On July 24, 2014, the Second Circuit issued its opinion in Mikohn Gaming Corp. v. Acres Gaming, Inc., [1] an opinion which provides some important guidance for patent practitioners. In this case, the defendants claimed that a patent-in-suit was invalid as anticipated by a prior art patent, but did not identify any claim language that incorporated the limitations of the prior

I wrote a number of extensions for the query object, and one of the functions they all share is that they all call this function: function fulltext_compare($query, $match_type, $is_strict = TRUE) { So when I accidentally hit enter, I wasn't aware that it would cause my entire query to reset. I'd like to prevent this from happening in the future, by doing this in the form validation: if (!empty($theForm['meta_keywords']) &&!empty($theForm['meta_description'])) { $query->query_compare($theForm['meta_keywords'], 'IN BOOLEAN MODE', $theForm['meta_description'], 'IN BOOLEAN MODE'); } Is there a way to make sure this function isn't called with the $query->query_compare() code? I saw a couple answers with the answer of no. But what I'd like to do is to unset the $query object and then call the query_compare() function (which is actually useless to do anyway because I have code that runs afterwards). Is there a way to keep this $query object valid, and prevent $query->query_compare() from running? A: Here are some ideas: 1) Instead of using query_compare(...) do your own comparison. Don't rely on comparison of $query->query_compare() with another value. 2) Add $query->has_no_further_query() to your if statement. This should prevent the query_compare(...) to be performed. 3) If you really need to do this instead of step 2) try to think of an alternative way to do the same. You could for example add a constant to your form. Than use this constant when you submit your form. In your php code you just have to check the constant and if it is empty
