Dietary patterns and alcohol use among adolescents in Southern Italy. The aim of this study was to assess dietary patterns of adolescents in Southern Italy, and their association with their alcohol consumption. Two-stage stratified cluster sampling was employed to select 795 11-year-old schoolchildren (403 boys and 392 girls) attending 2 different schools in Naples. A validated semi-quantitative food-frequency questionnaire (SQFFQ) was used to collect information on the usual food intake over the past year. Principal component analysis was applied to the dietary data to define three-dimensional food patterns. Odds ratios (OR) for alcohol consumption, adjusted for confounding factors and for total energy intake, were estimated. The main dietary patterns identified were a 'traditional' pattern characterized by high consumption of processed meats, refined cereals, desserts, sweetened beverages, and fast foods; a 'Westernized' pattern characterized by a high consumption of sweetened beverages and sweets; and an 'intermediate' pattern characterized by a high intake of fruits, vegetables, whole-grain products, and legumes, and by the consumption of snacks. The two latter dietary patterns showed a lower prevalence of alcohol use than the 'traditional' pattern. Odds ratio for alcohol consumption was 0.47 (95% CI 0.22-1.02) for the 'traditional' pattern compared with the 'intermediate' pattern, and 0.28 (95% CI 0.09-0.83) for the 'Westernized' pattern compared with the 'intermediate' pattern. These data show that adolescents who eat a healthy diet are less likely to consume alcohol than those who eat an unhealthy diet.
