To properly set Photoshop aside from other image-editing tools and put it into context, you need to consider how well it handles color information. Do you use the Grid as a design tool, or do you use it first to establish where colors will appear in your compositions? If the latter, how do you translate your creative decisions on paper? To illustrate, here's a background I made in Photoshop with a prism decal. When I view the file in Photoshop as a regular document, the white areas are white, and the black areas are black. The Prism Transparency appears in blue, but since I've set the document "as white" in Photoshop, it appears in black and white. This lets me take a blue stripe swatch, which is embedded into the document, and double-click it with the + swatch tool. It overlays over the document and becomes blue when I apply it to the document. Since the document is white, however, it shows up as a majorly gray-blue stripe. If I were to use this swatch on a real-life location, I can only see the blue sections of it. When you use the RGB or CMYK color models in Photoshop, Photoshop can display all three color channels (Red, Green, and Blue for RGB, and Cyan, Magenta, and Yellow for CMYK). These are like your sheets of construction paper backing. Photoshop lets you draw lines, or place and edit layers of this sort of color mesh to create your photo. Alternatively, you can turn them into a dynamic color swatch that you will be able to apply to the photo and reuse.
