The increased tension comes from the same audience of photographers that is pushed away from Lightroom. It's not sensible to pair the two together - unless Lightroom were to embrace all but the top-end features of Photoshop and become very affordable, in which case Adobe would likely lose a very valuable customer base. In the meantime, the target market is being split into two: on the one side, you have PCMag's readers, who are looking for the best price. On the other side, you have Lightroom customers. Adobe has a financial interest in locking people into its web-based software, of course. If Windows 10 and the Surface Pro 4 can make netbook-size computers as price-efficient as Chromebooks, as Apple is claiming, Photoshop and Lightroom would become more expensive and less useful. The same is true for Apple and iOS. There will always be usage limitations to the more expensive, more powerful products, and post-PC tech may even be legislated out of existence. That's especially true for people with a subscription. Prices will dive, making the free, powerful, and adaptable Lightroom more attractive. What we're seeing is a balance of power, with Microsoft, whose OS was funded by a company that makes digital photography, in a measure of control. Adobe, whose desktop software is fueled by the tables of a company that make digital printing, is in the middle. I admit that I am a swift convert to Lightroom 5. I had been using version 4 for three years before upgrading to 5.0 last winter. I've seen a lot of improvements to both the user experience and also how the software performs. Experiences like dark can be very swift. With an automated action on a diaristic timeline you could easily get very large sets of tasks done in an efficient (and fast) manner. It is much easier to A/B test new actions. Also, the dynamic actions allow the user to create their own custom actions that could be used for task filling or data cleansing.

When I was a kid, I would take a box of 8x10 glossy prints and cut them up into strips, and make collages- so-called “frames”. I would print one on one side of the background to complement my collage. The other side would sometimes be blank so I could have a distinct frame to hang in my living room of the piece of art I was working on. It was the 90s, and I didn’t really know what other people were doing. You did things differently if you were still alive in the 90s.
