The purpose of this proposed study is to determine if the same phenomena occur in animals that are maintained on a stable oral dosage of an opioid agonist such as morphine or methadone. In addition to testing the effect of varying the rate of drug administration, additional experiments will be conducted to determine if the effect is dependent on the route of drug administration and to determine if it is produced by other opioid agonists, such as fentanyl. In one experiment, a large dose of morphine will be given to rats and the magnitude of the effect measured in two different procedures. In the first procedure, the magnitude of the effect will be measured by monitoring drug-induced peak locomotor activity produced by a challenge dose of cocaine. In the second procedure, the magnitude of the effect will be measured by recording the consumption
